If Hunter (her brother whom I evaluated a few months ago) hadn't been evaluated we probably wouldn't have noticed ADHD in her. Her teacher last year said she was daydreaming/zoning out a lot. But all of her reports are A's. She works very hard, does all of it. Loves math (wants to do higher levels) loves to read. Some risk-taking behavior – she is so strong – climbed the monkey bars before the boys. She knocked out one of her front teeth – an adult one. She is very gregarious, very social, lots of friends, very independent. Athletics – up until recently – she was dancing on the field when playing – so she'd make errors – but that has changed and she now playing well – and we now see competitiveness.

4th grader in 3-4 graders in the classes. The 3rd graders are super smart. We know that she knows she's smart.

Hunter often complains that Naomi is mean to him. She does say mean things to him. His ADHD may be part of that. So this may be why, but she needs to understand him.

Pregnancy – Naomi and Hunter – twins – healthy pregnancy. Born at 35.5 weeks – so that was only a little early. No time spent in NICU. All the kids were breast fed. Their parents structured the days with kids to handle two kids at a time.

The first steps – Naomi could walk well before Hunter. Naomi is more like her mother. Always healthy.

Preschool – 2 years – PreK – 2 years. Hunter and Naomi were taken apart (to different classrooms) in PreK – second year. She did all the work at home during the COVID and was organized and tidy.

Naomi has no learning issues. 4th grade (now) is the first really hard year and if she is missing things due to inattentiveness, that could be impacting her learning.
